GENERAL INFORMATION SHEET

For Members of the President's Party

1. The Chinese are always on time. All members of the U.S. party should be equally punctual. You should always be on time, if not a few minutes early.
2. The Chinese will encourage you to dress warmly. They are very concerned when you do not dress properly with a heavy coat, scarf, and hat. There is a good reason for this as the Peking winters are severe.
3. The Chinese enjoy assisting Americans to learn simple Chinese phrases. The gesture of asking how you say "Thank you," "Good morning," and "Good night" is appreciated. The interpreters speak excellent English.
4. The Chinese usually step back and let a guest go through a doorway first. The gesture of letting your Chinese counterpart go through first would be most appreciated.
5. The Chinese do not usually give their names. It is suggested that you always ask. It is appropriate to use the surname with Mr. or Mrs., such as Miss Wong or Mr. Chiang, or to use the titles such as Vice Minister, Director, etc.
6. The Chinese take great pride in their food. Refrain from making comments unless they are complimentary and truly meant.
7. Instructions on currency exchange will be available by calling Mr. John Thomas once we are in Peking. When members of the party visit "Friendship Stores," currency exchange will be handled on the spot.
8. There will be opportunities for the party to go shopping in all three cities. The PRC Protocol Office is aware that members of the American party would like to visit the various Friendship Stores. We will alert you once arrangements for shopping have been worked out with our hosts (probably not until we have been in Peking for 2 or 3 days).
9. Virtually, every time one moves to a meeting or to an event, there will be time for rest, tea, and strong Chinese cigarettes. In sitting rooms, you will be given a cup of tea which could be black Chinese tea, green tea, or jasmine tea. Tea is classified as a stimulant and is served during rest periods as well as during meetings.

10. You may wish to offer American cigarettes to your Chinese friends and light them for them as a gesture of politeness. Chinese will do the same for you. Generally, Chinese women do not smoke and the women members of the party will probably not be offered cigarettes.
11. The Chinese are graced with a good sense of humor. Although they have some difficulty understanding American humor, they will try hard. You will find that they very much appreciate learning American phrases.
12. At the banquets and during the meals at the Guest Houses, you will find there will be three glasses in front of you. The water glass is for either beer or juice. The other two glasses are the wine glass and the Mao Tai glass. You can drink from the water glass any time during the meal. However, at banquets, the wine and Mao Tai are for toasting only. These glasses should not be raised without toasting one of your Chinese friends.
13. When entering or leaving a doorway, always look out for a cross board approximately 6" high. This is particularly true in the Forbidden City.
14. Do not leave important or classified papers unattended. At each location there will be a "secure" room where these papers may be left.
15. Keep the switchboard aware of your location at all times.
16. Do not discuss classified information or discuss matters you would not wish the Chinese to hear, in your residence, your car, or at any other time.
17. In all likelihood you will be assigned a PRC escort during your visit. You will be notified of the individual's name.
18. Buses may be used during the visit to transport members of the official and the unofficial party.

THE GREAT HALL OF THE PEOPLE

This multipurpose building is designed as a center for state functions. It is situated on the west side of Tien an Men Square, where the great parades of massed millions are held on China's public holidays such as National Day (October 1). It houses the offices of the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress--the basic organization of state (as opposed to Communist Party) authority. Chou En-lai, Premier of the State Council (which is constituted by the National People's Congress), has his offices in this building.

This huge structure contains more floor space than the former Imperial Palace. It has a theater with a seating capacity of more than 10,000, where Communist Party congresses and meetings of the National People's Congress are held. There is also a banquet hall which seats 5,000 and numerous reception rooms decorated according to the local designs of each of China's provinces and autonomous regions.

The building was constructed in 1958-59, at the time of the Great Leap Forward, in an 11-month period of intense activity. The design of the building embodies the best features of 84 designs drawn up by architects from six of China's cities. During each day of its construction more than 14,000 people from the various provinces and regions of China worked on the project.

REVOLUTIONIZED CHINESE OPERA

One of the areas of Chinese life most affected by the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution was the performing arts. Chiang Ching, Mao Tse-tung's wife, sought to transform the traditional Peking Opera into a revolutionary medium which would express the triumphs and virtues of the Communist revolution. These innovations implement Mao's instructions that the literary and performing arts should function primarily as political instruments for education of the people. "Art for art's sake" should not exist, according to Mao.

The Revolutionary Opera deals with 20th century themes, and is sung and spoken in modern standard Chinese. It has retained traditional music but sometimes adds such Western-originated instruments as the piano to the Chinese orchestra. Traditional gestures have been retained, but the colorful and fanciful costumes of the past have been replaced by the uniforms of the 20th century China. The opera is designed at the same time to entertain and indoctrinate.

The specific opera to be performed for you has not yet been revealed. However, there have been indications that the performance will be Sha Jia Bang, a brief description of which follows:

Sha Jia Bang-- The title of this revolutionary opera is a place name which might be translated: "The Sha Family Village." The setting is World War II in the area under the control of the Japanese and the puppet government they had set up in Nanking. Sha Jia Bang is the site of a hospital and rest station for wounded Communist troops. As the action opens, this village is about to be occupied by pro-Japanese puppet troops. The plot revolves around the inspired efforts of "Auntie Sha", the pro-Communist owner of the village tea shop, and a woman Communist cadre, "Sister Ah Ching," to prevent the puppet troops from discovering the whereabouts of the wounded Communists, whom the villagers have hidden in the marshes nearby. As the play ends, the Communist Eighth Route Army is coming to the rescue, and the villagers have arisen to attack the puppet troops.

The political theme of the opera is the patriotic opposition of the Communists to the Japanese Imperial Army, and the Chinese troops of the Japanese puppet government.

Sports and Physical Fitness in China:

Chairman Mao was a physical education enthusiast in his youth, and his interest in sports and physical fitness is now enshrined in the official policy of the People's Republic of China--particularly in Mao's love of swimming. Chinese are encouraged to exercise in groups, and mass calisthenics and gymnastics are a spectator sport.

Chinese athletes attribute their successes to the study of Mao Tse-tung Thought, and resolutely proclaim their opposition to the "championship mentality." Emphasis is placed on good sportsmanship and excellence of play, rather than on who wins or loses. Oftentimes, the scores and winners of matches are not even announced, and Chinese athletes who compete internationally maintain that their main objective is to promote friendship.

The most famous Chinese sport at the moment is, of course, ping-pong. A Chinese ping-pong team is expected to tour the U.S. in the spring of this year. Such teams, as well as Chinese soccer teams, have toured Africa, Eastern Europe, and parts of Asia in recent years. The holding of the Afro-Asian Table Tennis Friendship Invitational Tournament in Peking in November 1971 was a major international sporting event. Players from 49 countries and regions of Africa and Asia took part in competition watched by over 20,000 ping-pong fans.

In addition to fielding first-rate table tennis and soccer teams, the Chinese have some excellent gymnasts. A Chinese high jumper is reported to have bettered the current world record. The PRC is considering taking part in the 1972 Olympics in Munich.

Physical fitness has received much official attention during the past year, and in September a morning exercise program was launched. Calisthenic routines with musical accompaniment are now broadcast daily over the national radio network.

THE GREAT WALL OF CHINA

Over the past 2,500 years the major threat to China's security has come from nomadic tribes on the country's northern frontier. Several major dynasties, such as the Yuan or Mongol and Ching or Manchu, were established by powerful horse-mounted armies that invaded this peasant empire and overthrew the reigning Han Chinese emperor.

In the third century B.C., China's first emperor linked up existing fortifications on the northern frontier to ward off attacks from these nomadic tribes. Contemporary texts record that 300,000 men worked for 10 years to carry out his plans. The wall was rebuilt and extended by various later dynasties. The last major restoration for defensive purposes was done in the 16th century. The wall also served as a means of communication by which news, men, and supplies could travel through regions where otherwise movement was difficult. The present government has restored the Great Wall at three famous points.

The average height of the wall was 22 to 26 feet. It was 21 feet thick at the base and 18 feet wide at the top. It was faced with stone, and the inside was filled with earth and rubble. Arched gateways were built at intervals along it, ramps led to the top, and watch towers with observation terraces for signaling were spaced along it. At some particularly vulnerable points, as many as five, six, or even nine successive walls were built, giving defense in depth against horse-mounted invaders.

You will visit the Ba Da Ling portion of the Great Wall in the Ba Da mountains. This is at a strategic pass area that was rebuilt as recently as the Ming Dynasty (1500s) to deal with the threat from Manchuria. (The Manchus succeeded in overthrowing the Ming Dynasty in 1644, and established the last imperial dynasty, the Ching, which fell in 1911.)

THE MING TOMBS

From very early times China's Emperors built their own tombs near the capital city, generally during their lifetimes. In the early 15th century, the third Ming Emperor, Yung Lo, transferred his capital from Nanking to Peking and chose this valley for his tomb, called Chang Ling. Almost all his successors followed his example and had their tombs built nearby. Thirteen of the Ming Emperors lie here with their Empresses and their second wives. Hence the Chinese name for this site: Shih San Ling, the 13 tombs.

The site was chosen on the basis of the art of geomancy, or "feng shui." The semi-circular range of mountains to the north was said to act as a barrier against the harmful emanations brought by the winds (feng) from the steppes. The topography of the region enabled water (shui) to run gently in front of the tombs.

The tombs were originally protected by a long wall in the valley, and by guard posts on the hilltops. Only individuals who were in charge of their physical upkeep could enter the enclosure.

An impressive five-arch gateway, built of marble in 1541, announces the approach to the Ming Tombs. Almost a mile beyond is the Ta-hung Men (Great Red Gate). Everyone in Imperial China, including the reigning Emperor, was forced to dismount and walk from here along the "sacred way," or "the way of the spirit." (The body of the dead person was carried over this route at the funeral ceremony.)

About 500 yards beyond the Great Red Gate is the Stele Pavilion (Pei T'ing), erected in 1426. Beyond is the famous "avenue of animals," followed by the avenue of human statues. These statues all date from the 15th century. The mythical beasts are said to be animals of good omen, and the men, horses, and elephants are meant to serve the dead in the next world. Finally, 4 miles from the first gateway, is the chief tomb, which was of the Emperor Yung Lo. Most of the tombs consist of a tumulus--a round artificial burial mound, under which the remains are buried in a palatial vault--and a rectangular compound of gates, courtyards, hall, and pavilions laid out to resemble a giant keyhole. Once the Emperor had been buried, the passage leading to the vault was sealed, theoretically forever.

THE FORBIDDEN CITY

The Forbidden City was the residence of the Emperor and his household during various dynasties over the past 800 years. Common people were forbidden access to the area with its single story dwellings, paved courtyards, and imperial reception rooms such as the Hall of Supreme Harmony and the Hall of Mental Cultivation.

The Imperial Palace has stood in roughly the same place since the Yuan dynasty (1276-1368). When the third Ming Emperor, Yung Lo, decided to establish the capital of the Empire at Peking (1403), the palace was entirely rebuilt on a new plan, the general outline of which survives today. The work lasted from 1407 to 1420, and over 200,000 workmen were employed.

The Forbidden City is surrounded by a moat 160 feet wide and walls more than 35 feet high. Covering a 250-acre expanse in the geographical center of Peking, it comprised about one-sixth of the former Imperial city, which housed the administrative and maintenance organizations, granaries, stables, orchards, parks, residences of officials, and princes, and some of the palaces and pleasure gardens of the Emperor.

The outer buildings became a museum in 1914. Over 20,000 relics, excavated during the Cultural Revolution, are on display in the Imperial Palace Museum. Perhaps the most exciting discoveries came from the tomb of a Western Han prince and his wife (100 B.C. or earlier): two jade bodysuits joined with fine gold wire--the first of this type of burial dress ever to be excavated. They served as the burial dress of the great nobility, such as the Emperor, the kings and feudal princes of the Han dynasty. In addition to these treasures, the tomb contained more than 2,800 funerary objects, including bronze vessels, gold, silver, and jade objects, pottery lacquer ware, silk fabrics, and chariots and harnesses.

HANG-CHOU AND WEST LAKE

The city of Hang-chou is China's most famous tourist site, noted not only for its physical beauty, but also the outstanding regional products of tea and silk, and a mild climate.

West Lake is the focal point for tourist and recreation activities in Hang-chou. Parks, playgrounds, and temples line the lakeside, and the road which circles the lake offers magnificent views of wooded hillsides, ornate temples, and shaded walkways. The most beautiful points around the lake are considered to be the "Ten Scenes," some of which are described below.

Located on the east side of the lake, the Liu-lang-wen Ying (Listening to Orioles Among the Willows) is the largest of a series of tree-shaded parks in the lake complex. Within it is the Pigeon Pavilion and a hall that is used by visitors while listening to the birds singing in their ornate cages.

The Hang-chou Youth Palace, north of the pavilion, was rebuilt from a former monastery. A series of halls and rooms provide a variety of youth-oriented recreational and educational facilities.

The Ku Shan or Lonely Hill is an island containing a number of tombs of martyrs and heroes, pavilions, parks, and other buildings. It was once known as Imperial Island because of the many summer palaces built there by the Emperors. Most of these structures now are used as public museums or libraries.

The other three islands in West Lake are reached only by the ubiquitous white canvas-topped boats that carry tourists on the lake. The largest island, San-t'an Yin-yueh (Three Pools that Mirror the Moon), consists of pools and walks that lead to a central islet. The island has been laid out in a manner typical of Chinese gardening, emphasizing an ingenious interplay of plants, rocks, and water. The series of pavilions, terraces, pools, gardens, and walks on the island are designed to give a maximum number of views in a restricted setting.

Crossing the lake from north to south is the Sun Tung-plo Causeway. About 1.2 miles in length, it is broken by six ornate bridges that are designated by such picturesque names as Reflecting Waves and Crossing the Rainbows. At the north end of the causeway is one of the "Ten Scenes," the Ch'u-yuan Feng-ho (Lotus in the Breeze at the Crooked Courtyard), the site of the former Imperial brewery.
